

Natalia Nannou holds an MSc in Developmental Linguistics from the University of Edinburgh, Scotland (2015-2016). Her MSc dissertation “Syntactic and Lexical First Language (L1) Attrition: Greek Speakers under Attrition from L2 English”, was supervised by Prof. Antonella Sorace.

She is also an MA student in the program of Foreign Language Learning and Teaching at Aristotle University of Thessaloniki (2016-2017), where she was awarded a half-tuition merit scholarship. Her MA dissertation is supervised by Dr. Georgia Fotiadou (lead) and Dr. Marina Mattheoudakis and is focused on “The Effect of Pontic-Greek Bilectalism on Executive Functions in Healthy Ageing”.

She has been awarded an Erasmus full-year scholarship to study at the department of Linguistics at the University of Edinburgh (2013-2014).

She holds a BA in English Language and Literature from Aristotle University of Thessaloniki (2009-2015) and has volunteered in and attended a number of conferences on language acquisition. During her undergraduate teaching practice course she taught in the 1st Model Experimental Primary School SPE-AUTH and 1st Upper Secondary School of Panorama in Thessaloniki (2013).

Her research interests include first and second language acquisition and development, child and adult bilingualism and their cognitive effects, native language attrition and the relationship with executive functions. She is also a proficient speaker of German, holding a C2-level qualification degree by Goethe Institut (2015).